

Minimum Viable Document

This short report exists to give the corpus a deliberately minimal text document: two pages, one heading, and a handful of paragraphs. It exercises chapter and structure detection on a document that has no repeated furniture and no images.

The second paragraph repeats the same observation from a different angle, because a corpus fixture should be long enough to survive layout reconstruction without being so long that it slows the suite that must regenerate it.

Closing note

This short report exists to give the corpus a deliberately minimal text document: two pages, one heading, and a handful of paragraphs. It exercises chapter and structure detection on a document that has no repeated furniture and no images.